
Martinus Willem Beijerinck (1851–1931) of the Netherlands independently performed filtration experiments and realized the significance of a new type of infectious agent which he called contagium vivum fluidum (Centralbl. f. Bakt. Abt II, 5: 27, 1899). These investigations were the first chapters of virus research.